Mukesh Ambani, chairman of Reliance Industries and the richest Indian, has for weeks been silent on Delhi's controversial new legislation allowing a Muslim woman to divorce her husband by instant text, email, video or telephone call. Instead he has been blasting the fallout of the new law on relations between India's Catholic and Protestant communities. Religious groups argue that the decision to let Muslim women divorce by text or video message is tantamount to "forced conversion" because the widespread use of mobile phones means that no-one but the husband and wife will actually have to meet in person. Church leaders say thousands of Christian and Hindu families have already been ostracised and have given up their faith as a result. The Indian state of Goa, where 54% of the population is Christian, has been battling to halt the introduction of the legislation. Two Catholic church leaders have been arrested. Ambani, who is seeking to replace India's prime minister as the largest shareholder in Reliance Industries, has pledged to donate thousands of rupees (£9,000) for any act of "genuine Christian or Hindu conversion" in Goa. "I will leave Goa with a gift to the Catholic church of Rs 2 million to help the poorest of the poor to get the most basic things needed in life," Ambani is reported to have told Goa's police chief on Monday. He claimed the law was similar to the Islamic Sharia procedure by which Muslims can divorce by text. "The legal system of the people of Goa should not be dominated by aggressive priests," Ambani said. The Hindu-majority state is governed by a coalition of rightwing parties and the Catholic church. A three-judge constitutional bench is currently hearing a petition against the law, and it is expected to rule next month. The newly drafted law, known as the Goa Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Marriage) Bill, allows divorce by video or text message, depending on the circumstances. It removes the requirement for the wife to have to be physically present if a husband accuses her of infidelity. In many cases women are also not required to return to their husband's home if he divorces her and the family's reputation is damaged. During her divorce hearing, the woman's in-laws, including her father and brother, are often not allowed to sit in the same room as the woman because the decree is considered "private".

In learning a new skill or developing an existing one, sometimes, the first thing to think about is what to practice on. The basics are an important part of any craft, so you may be tempted to jump right in. However, the ability to continue improving on an activity is a key part of mastering it. The advantage of practicing on something simple and easy to master is that you get immediate results, so even small improvements can be noticeable. The lack of results or frustration can then build motivation to keep learning and moving up through the skills. The basis of most crafts is simple math or problems. You can practice math either by doing equations or problems on paper, or even by using a calculator. This is the same for any math-based craft. Math, however, is just one approach to learning math, and it's useful to go beyond just solving problems and develop your own approach to solving problems. Another approach that is especially useful for math is geometry. Because it is concerned with the structure of a thing, it's very useful to learn by drawing. The next craft, therefore, is to learn how to draw. The basis of most crafts is also usually some kind of memorization or repetition.
