The "R." - a little history... The year was 1916, and the United States was in the midst of the largest draft of women into the armed forces in our nation's history. In this amazing time, the U.S. government agreed to take one out of every four men (or three out of every four in the case of females) to serve in the Armed Forces. That's 100 million men and one out of every four women who would have never seen a day of conflict if the United States had not been interested in imposing its will on Europe during World War I. As these men and women took their obligations, so, too, did the expression on their chests change. The "r." or "rank sign," as it came to be called, was on the first shirts that they wore while in uniform. Many joined the Army, Naval, and Air Forces after graduating high school; others joined through apprenticeships; and some joined from the trades. In all, the draft affected approximately 100 million people in four years (1916 to 1919), and out of that number, approximately 10 million enlisted. The earliest and most-used rank sign was, of course, the name-by-rank system. In the Army, it was known as the M-O-M system. The Navy and the Air Forces continued to use it for more than 40 years. The rank signs were actually printed right on the chest of the uniform. By April 1917, the Army was authorized to issue its own rank of First Lieutenant. On July 26, 1917, the old rank sign and the new rank sign were combined. No longer could a First Lieutenant be distinguished from a Second Lieutenant. The rank sign, in its final expression in the Army was imprinted in five colors: It was not the end of the "r." in
