We are currently looking at a deployment model that uses the oob-deployment for all our web application. This includes all standard web app like JSF, resteasy, jquery. A standard testdriven development with these standard applications is possible without any problem. We are now starting to look at the next step and thinking about the possibility to split apart the applications that make up our application (some of which is an application that I developed). At this point we would like to know, if we still need to deploy these logic web applications without the standard apps. Or is the oob-deployment sufficient for all these applications? Is there any way to confirm, if the deployment is sufficient? A: No. Web containers are basically lightweight virtual machines, completely separate from the operating system and the underlying system. They do not share the same memory space, and therefore are separate in concept and implementation. The whole point of a Web container is to be able to create different, separate processes for different (web) applications/parts of an application. It is completely possible to run a Java EE application without the standard Web containers (http, Servlet, JSP and the like). The reason this was done was to run the standard Web container separately from the application server as a lightweight task server. The new Web containers have been completely rewritten from scratch (AFAIK). They do have some resemblence with the previous web containers, but the fundamental difference is that they are not a thin layer to run on top of the application server. Rather, they share the same memory space of the application server. As a proof of concept, you can try out the IBM WebSphere Application Server Developer Kit. Q: Why are movies in Italy so cheap? As an Italian, I know that America has "The Hollywood System" which is the oldest and most known system. And of course I'm aware of the long list of "rules" which the Hollywood Production System must follow (be it a screenwriter, director or actor). 0cc13bf012

SERS (surface-enhanced Raman scattering) provides an exciting way to detect trace organic compounds in a rapid, sensitive, and selective fashion. However, obtaining highly sensitive SERS probes with any desired selectivity requires various chemical modifications of the probes to avoid SERS interference from nonspecific surface molecules, and this can lead to complicated SERS probes. Herein, we report the first SERS-based dual-sensing platform for detecting ultra-trace mercury (Hg2+) and rhodamine 6G (Rh6G) simultaneously based on the use of pH-responsive MoS2 nanoplatelets (NPLs). The NPLs are synthesized by a hydrothermal method; their size can be regulated by the amount of NH4F, and the morphology can be tuned by the reaction temperature. In addition to obtaining a large Raman enhancement factor of 3.7 × 108, the dual-responsive SERS-based sensing platform retains a high selectivity against different contaminants, including metal ions and molecules with different functional groups. Meanwhile, the high sensitivity of the SERS probes toward Hg2+ and Rh6G facilitates the detection of ultralow concentrations (10-13 M for Hg2+ and 10-15 M for Rh6G) of Hg2+ and Rh6G with a detection limit as low as 10-12 M. In addition, the NPLs-based SERS probes retain a stable SERS response for nearly a week with a detection limit of 4 M. This work demonstrates that NPLs can be used as a multifunctional SERS-based material for the detection of trace metals and organic molecules in real water samples with high sensitivity and selectivity.Q: Check if a Set in jOOQ contains only one element I have to use jOOQ to build a SQL SELECT on a single column for
